Dear Dave,

First off, I heard that your baccalaureate speech was great – I am so sorry not to have been there. Second, [REDACTED] seems to have dropped out of sight – after an initial round of emails in which we expected to see him in early June for an interview, he has stopped responding to all messages. If that is not going to work, please let me know, as we had another possible candidate in train whom I put on hold in the interests of getting [REDACTED] Third, The attached presentation from a professor at San Diego who has done some great empirical work on ending civil wars and the implications of that research for Iraq is really worth reading – either by you or a member of your brain trust. And finally, would you still be interested in getting someone expert on Pakistan? The original person I had in mind proved not to be available, but I now have another.

All best,

AM

Subject: Iraq

Dear Anne-Marie,

The reason I was in D.C. last week was to give a presentation to a CIA sponsored conference entitled: "Iraq: Translating Security Gains Into Stability." At the conference I was asked to talk about the likelihood of recurring war in Iraq, especially given what we know historically about civil wars and their recurrence. I thought you might be interested in my comments, as well as a summary I wrote about what the quantitative data in international relations has to say about this subject. Both are attached.

Anyway, if you find it helpful, great. Take from it what you will.

Here's wishing you a very good and productive tenure.

Cheers,

Barb
